A Hand to the Plough

Patrick Evans spent 3 years as an Assistant Technical Officer with the Essex War Agricultural Committee. From 1953 until he retired in 1988 he farmed in Herefordshire in partnership with his brother Edward.

This book looks at the influences at work in the 21st century through science, economics, politics and religion. They raise challenges for all democrats, and the need for faith in the individual's ability to make a difference.

In the second half he outlines the farmer's contribution to this world picture, aiming to address all interested observers of the agricultural scene. This includes answering poverty, combating climate change, appreciating food quality and the need for fair trade to sustain unsubsidised profitability for farmers.

"A hand to the Plough is a remarkable compilation of inspiring essays which show the path to sustainable human happiness and well-being. The last chapter on the unity of the spirit brings out the great importance of integrating science and spirituality. This book is a must for all interested in fostering harmony with nature and with each other."

Readers' Comments

'The style is clear, free of jargon and a pleasure to read...'

'The references, always to the point, are drawn from wide and wise reading, and his judgements are notably fair minded...'

'This is not just a book on farming. It is a 21st century perspective on the evolution of humanity and the onward march of science and biotechnology in agriculture...'

'We need a coming together of different cultures in a common world enterprise to which the West is a contributor rather than a controller...'

'Its breadth of vision underpinned by 'critical evaluation of one's self,' was for me quite a powerful read.'

I was very impressed with the thoughtful approach to such a number of global problems and the un-dogmatic attitude...'
